This section seeks to select a few large nationally representative studies in which the subjects were asked to perform a task that required them to use their shoulders. In some cases, the subjects were asked to perform the task with their shoulders in an extreme wide angle position. In other cases, the subjects were asked to perform the task with their shoulders in a more neutral position. The results of these studies show that even extreme wide angles can replace the longer tele lenses of 100 mm or even more.
